J rgen Aschoff died 10 months after his wife in 1998, after a short illness at the age of 85 years. Work. Aschoff provided a strong foundation for the field of chronobiology through his research on circadian rhythms and entrainment in many different organisms such as rats, mice, birds, macaques, monkeys, and humans. His early research focused on understanding the properties of circadian rhythms and how these rhythms can change in response to stimuli. His later work was more applicable to

Additionally, the details of Aschoff's investigations into human biological rhythms have been omitted. Lastly, Aschoff's three rules should be listed and elaborated upon (with supporting evidence from Aschoff's work and from other investigators). Overall, the language should be revised to encourage scientific accuracy and the material should be expanded to include the methods of his
